

Freedom . . . must be acquired during the sojourn in the human kingdom

¹ Freedom presupposes accordance with the Law. We are free only to the extent that we act expediently. Otherwise we meet with resistance, a resistance that causes friction and shows us that the path is not free. The application of law entails freedom.

² The individual's freedom is a result of development. Freedom is not anything that is but something that must be acquired during the sojourn in the human kingdom; the acquisition of knowledge of the laws in the worlds of man and the ability to apply this knowledge. Man becomes free by identifying himself with an attainable ideal, by developing emotional attraction and mental understanding, by applying the Law according to his own insight, by fulfilling his duties and willingly reaping old bad sowing. The laws of life coincide with the purpose of life. "Absolute" freedom is the accordance of the individual will with this purpose.

³ The individual is free when he has entered unity
